Most students understand the meaning and importance of these standards, but should consult his or her instructor for appropriate counsel if there is confusion regarding academic honesty. It is important to understand that a student's ignorance the CHAC Student Code of Conduct is no legitimate defense for academic dishonesty. Academic dishonesty includes lying, cheating, stealing, and using unauthorized materials on any assignment, quiz or exam. For clarity, "lying," "cheating," and "stealing," are further defined below.

Ignoring the instructor's restrictions on acceptable material will result in appropriate discipline, determined by the instructor. Cheating also includes re-use of the same material or work used for another course, unless the student has obtained permission from the instructor to re-use the material. Cheating also includes plagiarism, which is the use or theft of another's ideas when those ideas are then declared as your own creation. Students are required to properly cite the original source of ideas and information used in CHAC assignments and papers.
- Stealing. Stealing is the act of removing another's possessions without permission and with no intention to return the stolen possessions to the rightful owner. The prohibition to stealing includes physical and intellectual property including but not limited to academic work.

In particular, school property is to be respected and maintained; illegal substances are not permitted upon the CHAC campus; and assault and harassment of others will not be tolerated. School property, illegal substances, and assault and harassment are discussed further below.

- School Property. Graffiti, defacement, and/or damage to school property is unacceptable and a violation of CHAC policy. Students observed deliberately damaging or defacing CHAC property shall be responsible for the costs of the damages resultant
